On 2 May a strike broke out at a small factory in Vitoria. The cause was apparently the usual complaint: the high cost of living. This incident was of little importance in itself as it affected only a small number of workmen, but the Civil Governor took a serious view of the matter and ordered the arrest of the manager of the factory. He also declared that the workmen involved would lose all their seniority rights, and would be required to sign new labor contracts before being re-admitted to work.

- 2. This attitude on the part of the Civil Governor gave rise to general ill-feeling on the part of the workmen and the management. Consequently, the strike spread on 3 May and was complete throughout the industrial section of town by 4 and 5 May. On these days store clerks were also on strike, although most stores were obliged to remain open.
- The Civil Governor announced that all those who did not return to work immediately would be deprived of their rights. However, on 5 May the Labor Delegate informed the workers that the Civil Governor was prepared to withdraw the sanctions imposed if all employees returned to their jobs on 7 May.
- On the morning of 7 May all, or at least most, of the men reported for work, but were confronted by armed guards posted at the entrance to each factory or workshop. The workers were told that they would not be allowed to return to work unless they signed new labor contracts. Printed leaflets were also distributed stating that the Civil Sovernor intended to enforce the sanctions he had imposed on the strikers.
- 5. Most workmen refused to sign and stayed out on 7 May. On being confronted with this new development, the Civil Governor ordered wholesale arrests, which were carried out in the streets and completely at random. By the evening of 7 May about 400 men had been arrested and were being held under guard at the bullring. Later, some or possibly all these men were transferred to the concentration camp at Manclares de la dea, located about 12 kilometers from Vitoria.

- C. On the following day, 3 May, all the men had returned to work, presumably signing new contracts, and seemingly impressed by the number of arrests. Vitoria has a small industrial population and the proportion of arrests was very high. The fact that the individuals arrested were taken to the bullring and later to Nanclares de la Oca also caused the impression that they would be held for a long period, and this undoubtedly also had its effect on the workers, and the sum of the second sec the arrests were caused by the fact that the authorities were 25X1A trying to prevent leakage of news of the strike to foreign broadcasting stations.

  - A Spanish oppositionist in direct contact with the Vitoria strikers reported that on h May about 15,000 workers were out on strike. On that day the police had arrested 60 persons. Those arrested were well treated by the police of Vitoria, but reinforcements called in from Manclares de la Gea on h May used strong arm tactics in dealing with the strikers. Among those arrested on 3 May were a number of women and children and a Catholic priest, Victoriano APISTI, who was accused of organizing a group of strikers belonging to the Hermandad Obrera de Accion Catolica. The Communists neither helped to organize nor participated in the strike. Although the workers originally had decided not to strike until 7 May, the occurrence of small strikes prior to that date reportedly forced Basque union leaders to change their plans and to advance the strike date to 5 May.
